Student Researcher, Jenny Kim, MD, PhD Research Group and Robert Modlin, MD Research Group
UCLA, Department of Medicine, Division of Dermatology

- Examined TLR-mediated antimicrobial activity via vitamin D-mediated pathways against Mycobacterium tuberculosis. Manuscript in Public Library of Sciences Biology. UCSF Summer Research Dean's Fellowship 2007
- Studied the role of Propionibacterium acnes (P.acnes) and its ability to induce matrix metalloproteinase's in primary human monocytes. Manuscript accepted in Journal of Investigative Dermatology.
- Researched the induction of CD1b+ dendritic cells and CD209+ macrophages in the innate immune response to P.acnes. Manuscript in Journal of Immunology.
- Characterized the inflammatory response to P.acnes in sebocytes, keratinocytes, and monocytes and its role in the pathogenesis of acne vulgaris. Techniques performed included immunohistochemistry, colony forming units assays, cytokine ELISA assays, flow cytometry, and quantitative PCRs.

My research interests are focused on injectables, lasers, light-based therapies, and technologies in the application of treating skin aesthetic and skin diseases, primarily facial inflammatory dermatoses such as acne and rosacea, acne scarring, and rejuvenation. During my last year of residency at New York University Langone Medical Center, I spearheaded a research project that evaluated the safety profile and efficacy of various laser treatments, including the novel picosecond laser, for pigmentary disorders in skin of color patients. At Marmur Medical, I worked on multiple investigator-initiated clinical trials for injectable fillers and novel light-based laser modalities for treatment of acne vulgaris.

In addition to my interest in lasers and injectables, I am deeply committed to determining, implementing, and providing sustainable health care for underserved communities, particularly for international resource-limited populations. From my personal experiences of living abroad in Thailand, my year-long clinical research fellowship in Kampala, Uganda, to my clinical activities, including a senior clinical elective month in Botswana, global dermatology is a strong research and clinical interest. I am involved in a non-governmental organization called Standing Voice, which supports local stakeholders from activists, grass roots organizations, community educators, healthcare workers, government organizations, and other charities to support the de-marginalizing persons with albinism. With Standing Voice, we are working on research studies evaluating the effectiveness of the first and only skin surgery workshop for community dermatologists in Tanzania and epidemiological studies in persons with albinism in sub-Saharan Africa.

Clinical Profile

My clinical interests include cosmetic dermatology, specifically combination treatments involving biostimulatory and hyaluronic acid fillers with energy-based devices, skin tightening, laser surgery, botulinum toxins, and cosmeceuticals, and medical dermatology, specifically acne and rosacea.

I have a strong passion for public service, which I pursue in three different avenues – medical journalism, medical education, and global health.

Medical journalism is a public service necessary for an educated democratic society in order to inform people about dermatology to educate, empower, and embolden patients to take an active role in their skin health care. I share my dermatologic expertise with media, social media, and consumer beauty brands for public education, contributing to multiple media outlets such as NY Times, TODAY Show, Allure, InStyle, Cosmopolitan, Harper's Bazaar, New Beauty, Fox 5 NY News, Cleo Thailand, Health, Women's Health Magazine, Self Magazine, GQ Magazine, Conde Naste Traveler, Origins, American Spa Magazine, Prevention, Buzzfeed, TheFashionSpot, StyleCaster, Lane Crawford, Sharecare, Brydie, Reader's Digest, Refinery 29, Doctor Radio with Sirius XM, and etc.

I am committed to creating collaborative experiences across various industries to provide novel and creative ways to educate and engage all generations about beauty and skin health.

As a clinical assistant professor at New York University Langone and previously Mount Sinai, I am committed to the education and clinical training of dermatology resident physicians and medical students.

I am on the Advisory Committee and volunteer my time with Standing Voice, a UK-based charity focused on de-stigmatizing and supporting persons with albinism in East Africa, in order to train and teach local Tanzanian dermatologists regarding skin cancer diagnosis and treatment. Global health relies on creating a sustainable infrastructure within the local community rather than medical missions to impact notable and meaningful change.
